

Roger S. Schenke

Roger is the founding chief executive officer of ACPE, a position he held until his retirement in 2008. During his tenure, he designed and conducted over 75 educational programs, developed the Masters of Medical Management degree program in conjunction with ACPE's university partners, brought ACPE into a robust distance education program and co-developed ACPE's distance education MBA with Eric Berkowitz, PhD.

He has authored numerous texts and articles including the Physician in Management, and a series of articles some of which formed the basis of ACPE's Keystone Program. On a regular basis, he has taught in six different ACPE educational programs.

Roger teaches leadership and management not only in health care but to organization, corporations, and associations in the financial services, manufacturing, legal, military and public service sectors. His areas of specialty include organizational politics, influence, managing governance and staff meetings, managerial decision making and interpersonal communication.

Mr. Schenke obtained his Bachelor of Science degree from Widener College and his MBA from George Washington University.
